Kerstin Brückweh presents a part of her recent work on the history of knowledge production, analyzing British censuses and surveys from the early 19th century until today's digital age. The history of the methods underlying this huge project of counting people can be understood as a history closely related to present-day problems and discussions about Big Data.

Kerstin Brückweh currently works in an interdisciplinary research project on the history of qualitative social sciences in Germany. She used to work at the German Historical Institute in London and at the Eberhard Karls Universität in Tübingen before she joined Trier University.

Everyone is welcome to attend.
