With Great Britain's declaration that it will withdraw from the European Union, the procedure under Article 50 TEU has been initiated. Professor Jürgen Basedow's lecture will explain what this means in real terms. Which legal questions have to be set during the next two years? What happens when an agreement cannot be reached? What perspectives already exist for a future working relationship between the EU and Britain – especially within the realms of civil rights?

Professor Jürgen Basedow has been director of the Max Planck Institute for Comparative and International Private Law in Hamburg since 1997. His publications cover a wide range of topics, such as conflict of laws and international civil procedural law or antitrust law. Besides the Brexit, he is currently working on topics such as the transnationalisation of private law, and the history of comparative law.

Everyone is welcome to attend.
